Learning Festival in February 2021 explores the theme of connectivity – in our hyperconnected world are we truly connected, or in fact becoming more disconnected? When we face isolation, how can music connect us?

Remaining true to its distinctive artistic identity, Wigmore Hall continues to expand its audiences and international reach. Through John Gilhooly's concert programming, the Hall's success in building and sustaining relationships with artists, its learning and participatory activity, its broadcasting – such as its partnership with BBC Radio 3 and its live internet streams – and through schemes like its £5 tickets for under-35s (in collaboration with Classic FM) and free tickets for under-25s (in collaboration with The CAVATINA Chamber Music Trust), Wigmore Hall is attracting a larger and more diverse audience than ever before. Each season, some 200,000 people now attend events at the 550-seat hall, and they are complemented by radio listeners and online viewers all over the world who have free access to its growing library of audio and video broadcasts, regardless of background or income.

John Gilhooly, said:

'It has been a huge personal honour and joy for me to put together Wigmore Hall's 120th season, and to further expand our learning, digital and outreach activities. I believe that music can speak to us at every stage of life, and that it accompanies us right through life. This is the guiding principle for what we do here. We look beyond boundaries and genres, and we celebrate the life-enhancing power of great music-making, up close.'

Wigmore Hall nurtures artists throughout their careers, and the 2020/21 Season will feature many musicians who have enjoyed decades of prominence on the world's musical stages and a long association with Wigmore Hall – among them Sir Andrés Schiff, Stephen Kovacevich, Martha Argerich, Christian Zacharias, Steven Isserlis, Gerald Finley, the Borodin Quartet (celebrating its 75th anniversary) and the Hagen Quartet (celebrating 40 years as an ensemble).

Another pillar of the season is formed by artists who have established their reputations within the past 10 years, not least through regular appearances at, and championing by, Wigmore Hall. One of these is Igor Levit, who will mark Beethoven's 250th birthday (which falls in December 2020) with a complete cycle of Beethoven's piano sonatas, running from September 2020 to July 2021. This will not be Levit's first Beethoven cycle at Wigmore Hall – he undertook the mighty challenge previously in the 2016/17 Season – but he now returns once again at John Gilhooly's invitation, to perform the cycle twice in 20/21 across a total of 16 concerts, coinciding with the release of his complete Beethoven sonata recordings on Sony.

Among the young artists appearing in 2020/21, two who already look set to become close to Wigmore Hall are the American pianist Andrew Tyson (whose June 2019 recital at the Hall led The Sunday Times to name him one of its 'most exciting rising stars') and the Macedonian-born mezzo-soprano Ema Nikolovska, currently a BBC Radio 3 New Generation Artist, who in 2019 won the Guildhall Wigmore Prize and, at Wigmore Hall itself, the Kathleen Ferrier Awards' Loveday Song Prize and the Maureen Lehane Vocal Awards.

The season will bring a total of some 1,000 concerts and events. This is an overview of just some of them.

IN-DEPTH EXPLORATIONS OF GREAT REPERTOIRE PAST AND PRESENT

- Mendelssohn is strongly represented in the season. His complete string quartets are played in four concerts by the Elias String Quartet; his unaccompanied sacred choral music is presented by The Cardinal's Musick beside works by Bach, Schumann and Brahms, and he is paired with Liszt in a song series that features Maria Agresta, Ian Bostridge, Dame Sarah Connolly, Stuart Jackson, Julia Kleiter, Julian Prégardien, Miah Persson, Anna Lucia Richter, Nicky Spence and Roderick Williams, with pianist Julius Drake.
